Figure 1. The structure of the proposed model. The model is designed to predict the probability of a user's next action (e.g., click, like, share) based on the user's historical actions and the content of the item being interacted with. The model consists of two main components: a user embedding layer and an item embedding layer. The user embedding layer takes the user's ID as input and outputs a user embedding vector. The item embedding layer takes the item's ID as input and outputs an item embedding vector. The user embedding vector and the item embedding vector are combined to form a joint embedding vector, which is then passed through a neural network to predict the probability of the user's next action.
